From Theory to Practice: The Student Experience Evaluating Development Projects Focused on Nature-Based Solutions

Abstract: Graduate students often seek hands-on experiences in the international development field. Given that Multilateral Development Banks (MDBs) provide hundreds of billions of dollars in aid each year, we expected that reviewing the design, implementation, and outcomes of their environmental projects would provide valuable learning outcomes for students. This novel study on Nature-based Solutions (NbS) in the Global Environment Facility (GEF) gave students the opportunity to engage directly with practitioners in the review of 50 environmental projects across 45 countries. A team of professionals from the Scientific and Technical Advisory Panel (STAP) of the GEF and eight students from the University of Michigan School for Environment and Sustainability and the University of Maryland School of Public Policy developed lessons learned from reviewing the GEF portfolio over a twenty-year time span. When screening projects for enabling conditions including theory of change, climate risk screening, multi-stakeholder engagement, and adaptive management, most had stronger explanations of the environmental than the social outcomes sought, and only more recent ones incorporated climate risk screening. The process and findings associated with this educational experience contributed to students' climate change leadership development; for example, by learning about the tradeoffs and possible co-benefits of improving both environmental conditions and livelihoods in less developed countries. Our research led to practice advice for the design of future GEF projects, as well as ideas for future coursework to further bridge the gap between theory and practice in academia, which we believe to be essential to preparing the next generation of climate leaders.

1. Introduction

Many graduate students seek careers tackling climate change in the international practitioner domain. However, there is little scholarship on using development agencies' projects as a learning experience for students. The Global Environment Facility (GEF) requested a review of 50 completed and ongoing GEF projects that included "Nature-based Solutions" (NbS) (NbS are defined as "actions to protect, sustainably manage and restore natural or modified ecosystems that address societal challenges effectively and adaptively, simultaneously, providing human well-being and biodiversity benefits" [1,2]) to determine what lessons could be learned to inform future investments. The projects reviewed represented an investment of USD 377 million, and an additional USD 2.7 billion in co-financing across 45 countries.

The GEF serves as a "financial mechanism" to five multilateral environmental treaties and conventions: the Convention on Biological Diversity, the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change (UNFCCC), the Stockholm Convention on Persistent Organic Pollutants, the UN Convention to Combat Desertification, and the Minamata Convention on Mercury (for more on the GEF, please see <https://www.thegef.org/partners/>
