Forests and French Sea Power, 1660-1789 Paul

Bamford,1956-12-15 By choosing to concentrate upon discovering what forest resources were available to the French navy during the ancien r gime and what use it was able to make of them Mr Bamford has not only provided the first monograph on that subject in the English language but has gone far toward explaining why France was the loser in the long duel with England for the control of commerce and the extension of empire Two years of research in the Archives Nationales and in the Archives de la Marine in Paris Toulon and Rochefort enabled him to draw on contemporary sources of information of which little if any use has been made before and a further year of research in the libraries of New York City particularly in the rich Proudfit Naval Collection also yielded new material It is Mr Bamford s achievement to have handled this vast store of primary sources with such skill and judgement that the reader by turning over letters from disgruntled forest proprietors reports from harassed ma tres on the trickery and recalcitrance of the peasants instructions from the top echelon of the navy to inspectors in the forests and a variety bills receipts and memoranda is given at first hand an appreciation of the difficulties faced by the navy in trying to obtain timber and masts of the choice quality required for building ships of the line The navy had to compete with the merchant marine and with industrial and private users of fuel for supplies that were continually being depleted by mismanagement and by the conversion of forests to arable land Measures superficially admirable for conserving the forests are found on closer examination to be at once over precise and not properly enforced Transport even in a country so abundantly supplied with navigable rivers as France was expensive and difficult Empire Forestry Journal ,1926 The Commonwealth Forestry Review ,1926 Quarterly Journal of Forestry ,1928
