

The forests

In natural places where light and humidity conditions are favorable, the growth of a large numbers of trees lead to the creation of forests. Even though there are many varieties, the weather type helps classify forests in three main groups: temperate, tropical (in warm regions) and boreal (in cold regions).

TEMPERATE

Are located in areas with mild climates, with average temperatures of 20°C. They can be made of deciduous trees that lose their leaves in autumn and re-grow them in spring and perennial trees that have leaves all year long.

600 years

is the approximate life-time of an oak, one of the most common deciduous trees.

BIODIVERSITY

This forest is a great habitat for many species such as deer, foxes, squirrels and numerous birds.

TROPICAL

Are found in the regions near the equator, where the weather is warm with heavy rains. They are the forest with the richest vegetation.

LAYERS IN THE EQUATOR

The tropical areas are the ideal for us to learn about the different layers of the forest.

2,5

is the height of the tallest tree in the Amazon jungle, the largest tropical forest.

BOREAL

Are located at about 60° latitude, in cold regions where temperatures can reach -20 °C in winter. It has a vegetation that can withstand the cold and the snow, such as conifers.

CONIFERS

Trees such as pines, with cone or pineapple shaped flowerings as well as leaves shaped as needles.

WINTERING TIME

Winters are so harsh that some animals, such as the bear, can spend several weeks sleeping until the weather improves.

GIANT TREES

Some trees can grow to be 90 meters high. It is called the emerging canopy.

LAYERS

Forests have different layers or levels. Each one is at a different level and has its own animals, plants and insects.

- 1 Canopy: the top of the forest, where the majority of birds live.
- 2 Undergrowth: the lower part of the forest, where plants and animals grow. Animals like foxes, rabbits and mice live here.
- 3 Ground: the bottom part of the forest, where insects and small animals live.
