Economic Forecasting Terence C. Mills,1999      Neural Networks and the Financial Markets Jimmy Shadbolt,2002-08-06 This is a book about the methods developed by our research team over a period of 10 years for predicting financial market returns The work began in late 1991 at a time when one of us Jimmy Shadbolt had just completed a rewrite of the software used at Econostat by the economics team for medium term trend prediction of economic indicators Looking for anew project it was suggested that we look at non linear modelling of financial markets and that a good place to start might be with neural networks One small caveat should be added before we start we use the terms prediction and prediction model throughout the book although with only such a small amount of information being extracted about future performance can we really claim to be building predictors at all Some might say that the future of markets especially one month ahead is too dim to perceive We think we can claim to predict for two reasons Firstly we do indeed predict a few per cent of future values of certain assets in terms of past values of certain indicators as shown by our track record Secondly we use standard and in house prediction methods that are purely quantitative We allow no subjective view to alter what the models tell us Thus we are doing prediction even if the problem is very hard So while we could throughout the book talk about getting a better view of the future or some such euphemism we would not be correctly describing what it is we are actually doing We are indeed getting a better view of the future by using prediction methods
