

An Englishman's Home

INTRODUCTION

BRIEF BIOGRAPHY OF EVELYN WAUGH

Evelyn Waugh was born in 1903 to a somewhat literary family. His father was a publisher and biographer, and his brother Alec would also become an author in his own right. After attending public schools in his youth, Waugh won a scholarship to Oxford University, where he sought out and gained entrance to the social circles of the aristocratic elite. Losing his scholarship due to poor grades before he could obtain his degree, Waugh dropped out of Oxford and took a series of teaching jobs in Wales, Buckinghamshire, and Notting Hill while publishing short stories and drafting his earliest novels. In 1928, Waugh got married and published his first novel, Decline and Fall, an immediate commercial and critical success. Two years later, he converted to Catholicism, a spiritual transformation that impacted the rest of his life. After a stint as a foreign correspondent in Ethiopia and Eritrea, Waugh annulled his marriage, remarried, and moved with his new wife to Piers Court, a country estate in Gloucestershire. When World War II began soon after, Waugh entered the Royal Marines. Although he saw little of the front lines, he did write and publish Brideshead Revisited, his best-known work. After the war, Waugh became increasingly conservative and critical of the modern era. He began to lose both popularity and money, and although he produced many decently received novels after 1945, his expenditures outpaced his earnings, and he died in poor health in 1966.

Home as a Castle. The title of "An Englishman's Home" comes from the popular maxim "An Englishman's home is his castle." The saying dates to at least the 17th century, as Edmund Coke wrote in 1628: "For a man's house is his castle, et domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium [and his house is his safest refuge]."

Bright Young Hypocrite. While at Oxford, Waugh became a member of the Hypocrites' Club, a group of wealthy and flamboyant young men who partied, drank, and made mischief together. Including Waugh, several members of the Hypocrites' Club would go on to be involved with the Bright Young Things, an elite group of London socialites and artists who inspired characters in Brideshead Revisited.

PLOT SUMMARY

In the rural English village of Much Malcock, Mr. Metcalfe goes about his morning routine. As he putters around his house and garden, he reflects on his love of the countryside and his eagerness to appear a "true countryman." Having made his fortune as a businessman in the Alexandrian cotton trade, he has only recently moved to Much Malcock with his wife and is keen to fit in with his neighbors. In his upper-class social sphere, he is by far the newest addition—everyone else has lived in the area for 20 years or more. There's Colonel Hodge, a blunt man who has little money but good social standing, especially with local organizations like the Boy Scouts; the Hornbeams, a pretentious couple who make a point of leading a rustic lifestyle and practicing spiritual techniques; and Lady Peabury, a self-indulgent but judgmental widow who owns much more land than any of the others.

While in his garden, Mr. Metcalfe sees two unfamiliar, urban-looking men in his farming neighbor's cow pasture. Consulting his gardener Boggett, he learns that they have bought his neighbor's land and must be planning to build on it. Horrified, he hurries to Lady Peabury's house to share the news and consult with her. To his chagrin, she expresses the belief that the land in question had always "gone with" his house and that, since Metcalfe himself ought to have bought the land when he initially purchased his house, he's at fault for the situation. Mr. Metcalfe, who was hoping to propose a plan for all of the wealthy neighbors to pitch in to buy the land back, calls a meeting of all four households a few days later. When he introduces his idea, their response is lukewarm at best, and he finds that they agree with Lady Peabury that the onus is on him to shoulder the full price of the field. He tries to persuade them otherwise, but when Lady Peabury makes a passive-aggressive comment, he loses his patience and shuts down completely.

Colonel Hodge seeks out the man who bought the field and finds him in the local inn. Reporting back to Mr. Metcalfe, he tells him that the man—Mr. Hargood-Hood—intends to build
