The Crucible - Arther Miller

INTRO

Texts offer representations of how individual authoritative power can be utilised to manipulate the collective human emotions of society, creating widespread hysteria. By weaponising fear that manifests within humanity, morally corrupt individuals and institutions have the ability to achieve absolute control, removing the attention from their own motivations. This is reflected in Arther Miller's allegorical tragic play "The Crucible" (1953). Miller conveys the fear-stricken society of the Salem witch trials in Massachusetts, likening this to his context of McCarthyism in 1950s America. He clearly demonstrates the wilding of religion to create a weapon to maintain authority, causing hysteria. However, Miller recognises the capacity of hope for humanity through the acknowledgment of corrupt power and recognition of sins leading to anagnorisis of characters true motivations later revealed. Furthermore, through the play form, Miller is able to expand his allegory, through actors within a stage allowing the revival of the past within the present, empowering America to break free of the consuming fear of communism. He utilises his characters as constructs, negative symbols of power like Joseph McCarthy, represented through Abigail and Danforth and the flawed American represented through Proctor.
