

Ethical Theory and Personal Morals

Topic: Sociology | Words: 415 | Pages: 1

The appropriate ethical theory to address the dilemma in scenario two is deontology. This theory would be effective because the officer already must protect the law and has a clear set of rules to follow. Deontology presumes that a fixed set of rules exists and prescribes the person to follow those rules independent of circumstances or consequences. While ethical theory defines how the person should behave in each situation, personal morals define how the person views and judges other people's actions. The distinction is crucial since ethical theory, particularly deontology, can be at least somewhat objective. Personal morals, however, cannot be separated from the person and their background, political views, intrapersonal relationships, et cetera (Walker & Lovat, 2017). Actions dictated by personal morals could contradict the deontological theory, which dictates the officer to follow the rules at all times, independent of consequences. One of the drawbacks of deontology is the possibility of such situations where no existing law is applicable, whether due to lack of information or the novelty of circumstances. In these situations, morals must guide the actions since they are the only guidance available.

If I were the officer in the scenario, I would insist on bringing the mayor in for an alcohol test. This course of action is the only one appropriate for the officer sworn to protect the law and "safeguard the citizens" (Schmallegger & Hall, 2017, p.433). Furthermore, this action will be effective in preventing future transgressions by the mayor. While one might argue that this particular scenario describes a victimless crime, the law enforcement officer has a duty to protect the state, and "the
