

The electrical generator that can provide free electricity (the Machine)

Invention and Development

This machine has been developed for a span of six years by John Crispin, a businessman and Leu Briks, an electrician. The inventors' propositions about the machine have been endorsed by Steve Brasington who is an independent engineer. The machine is called a home generator because of its design, functionality and the most applicable place for its use. In this case the most critical feature in the name is "generator" simply because it is capable of producing power.

However, the magnetic electrical generator is more than the information outlined about it.

Operation of the Magnetic Electrical Generator

The generator is started from a battery ignition or through a manual kick. The generator utilizes a capacitor that is charged by the car battery. According to John, the world's electrical power is produced through capacitors that are equally charged by the rotating turbines. Once the generator is kick-started it can run for years without stopping. After the capacity is charged, it uses the charge to propel the motor that in turn produces power. According to John and Leu, the generator is capable of producing 24 kilowatts in one day. In simple deduction, it implies that the generator has the capacity to produce one kilowatt per hour, power that is equally sufficient to sustain domestic operations effectively.

Principle Involved in Running the Machine

According to Steve Brasington, the machine utilizes principles applied in car generation today but in a unique way. John also describes the machine's operation to be similar to the operation of the car engine and imperatively, the car engine can be replaced by the generator.
