

Traditional Economics

Assumes that consumers are rational

- Driven by the utility they get from consumption
- Make long term plans and follow them
- Take as much time as they need to absorb all of the information in the market
- Focus on the facts in a very logical manner
- Know exactly what they want and why they want it

Behavioural Economics

Assumes that humans are complex

- Information overload can complicate decision making
- Consumers take risks, sometimes going against reason
- Emotions play a large role in the decision-making process
- The ability to make the best decision is influenced by many biases
- People care about more than just maximising their self interest
