

Musée d'Orsay

The Musée d'Orsay is located inside an old train station, along the Left Bank of the Seine, in front of the Tuileries. The building was constructed for the 1900 World's Fair and for this could be considered to be the museum's very first work of art. In 1986, it was modified to house an important collection of masterpieces: the works of the Impressionists and post-Impressionists. These are revolutionary works of art, that broke with and subverted the iconographic traditions of the time, paving the way for further experimentation and study that then lead, in some respects, to Abstractionism. In the early 1870's a group of painters brought their works together in a new exhibition. These painters were no longer interested in classical representations, in mythology or historical reproductions, they didn't want to conform to a style of painting that meticulously reproduced every single detail. These painters wanted to paint out in the open, depict the instant, and capture the infinite feelings that the light could create in the eyes of the viewer.
