

Introduction to Electrocardiograms (ECG's)

When three waves "bump" up against you, you are in trouble on the P-wave. Normalized from the electrical conduction system, that the SA node is responsible for this. The next wave you see is called a QRS. This refers to normal QRS complexes. The QRS complexes represent summation of the ventricles. After the QRS, you will see a "bump" which after the ventricles. This "bump" is called the T wave and is caused by the ventricles relaxing. The ventricles are no longer flat when they contract. Subsequently the forms a large electrical impulse that penetrates the QRS complex. Therefore, when they relax, they form a small electrical impulse that penetrates.

Below is a normal ECG strip with 6 waves. Each wave is labeled with its corresponding wave name.
