Background: The context of this research is reading literacy instruction in Foundation Phase classrooms in South Africa. Although large-scale studies have researched learner performance, little is known of the nuances of teachers' practice, particularly in the non-verbal realm. This research seeks to address that gap.

Aim: This research investigated teachers' gestural and postural enactments during reading literacy instruction in the Foundation Phase. It identified and described these enactments to understand their function.

Setting: The research sites comprised three Grade One classrooms in suburban government schools. The research focused on the Foundation Phase speech event 'Reading on the Mat', a variation of Group-Guided Reading.

Methods: This article presents a strand of a linguistic micro-ethnography. An analysis of the forms and styles of communication showed the salience of gestures and postures in teachers' practices. The research used an established framework to analyse non-verbal communication and also generated a framework to analyse postural communication.

Results: These teachers deployed gestures and postures to enact their instruction. Learners embodied their learning by copying gestures and using them in recall. Postures were used to provide signals to learners and visiores related to the function of activities on the Mat.

Conclusion: The article concluded that gestures and postures can be deliberately employed in the service of literacy teaching in the Foundation Phase. Their analysis can also reveal the function of enactment practices to researchers.

Contribution: This article adds to the understandings of embodied practices. It presents original categories that may be useful in similar research into teachers' practices.

Keywords: enactment; embodiment; gestures in reading instruction; postures in reading instruction; early reading instruction practices.

Introduction

Rigorous large-scale research over the last decade has shown that South African learners are underperforming against international benchmarks in the key area of early reading literacy. For example, results of the Systemic Evaluation (SE) 2003; the Annual National Assessments (ANAs), 2014–2017; the Southern and East African Consortium of Educational Quality (SACMEQ) 2005, 2010, and 2017 and Early Grade Reading Study (EGRS), 2015–2016, and 2018 all highlight the inability of young South African learners to move beyond decoding and to read for meaning (Govender & Hugo 2020). The Progress in International Reading Literacy Study (PIRLS) (Howie et al. 2007, 2012, 2017, DoE 2021) presents similar results.

In response to this research NGOs and education departments have focused on providing materials designed to improve learner performance. However, the EGRS evaluation report acknowledges the fact that simply distributing the resources has not improved reading outcomes significantly and that the effectiveness of materials depends on how they are used by teachers (Taylor et al. 2017). The 2022 Reading Panel Background Report similarly suggests that changes to teachers' practices rather than resources are the key to improved outcomes (Spaull 2023).

Although the importance of practice is increasingly acknowledged by the large-scale research mentioned above, teachers' practices in Foundation Phase classrooms remain opaque. This article presents research into the gestures and postures which teachers use as complementary semiotics in the multimodal teaching of young learners. The non-verbal is a powerful but largely
