

TENCH Tinca tinca

Tinca, Latin name for Tench

The Tench was first listed in the Great Lakes, in the current form of Lake Ontario, when pilot a scientific paper published in 2014 identified it as the most recent Lake Ontario invader.

DESCRIPTION: The Tench is a medium-sized, deep-bodied fish with a deep caudal peduncle up 1/3. It has a single prominent barbel on each side of the mouth. It has very small unlobed scales (25-100 lateral scales) and a short dorsal fin with 8-9 rays. It is overall olive to dark green to almost black with a golden sheen. The belly is golden. The snout is short. The tail is slightly forked with rounded lobes. Some mature males have a large tubercle on the side of the body.

SIMILAR SPECIES: No other fish in the genus has a combination of a deep body, very small scales, a pair of barbels at the corner of the mouth, and a slightly forked tail with rounded lobes.

FEEDING: The Tench is omnivorous, eating a wide variety of aquatic insects, algae, crustaceans, mollusks, and plants. Usually feeding at night, the Tench depends on its barbels for taste and touch perception and its sense of smell to detect food.

REPRODUCTION: The Tench spawns in warm, vegetated shallow to low spring and summer when water temperatures reach 20°C. The female releases sticky eggs over submerged plants, and one or two males follow behind releasing sperm. Females and males release egg and sperm several times during the spawning season.

HABITAT: The Tench prefers the down-current shallow of streams, ponds, wetlands, and lakes with dense vegetation and muddy or sandy bottoms.
