Norman Geschwind, Peter O. Behan, 1982 We report an experimental study designed to test the following hypothesis derived from clinical observations There is an elevated frequency in left handed individuals and in their families of immune disease migraine and developmental learning disorders In two separate investigations the frequency of these conditions was compared in strongly left handed subjects and in strongly right handed controls In each of the investigations we found markedly higher frequencies of immune disease in the left handers than in the right handers The rate of learning disabilities was also much higher in the left handers than in the right handers in both investigations In a second study the frequency of left handedness was compared in patients with migraine or immune disease and in general population control subjects free of these disorders There was a higher frequency of left handedness in patients with migraine and myasthenia gravis than in controls We present a brief outline of a hypothesis that may account for an increased frequency of immune disease in left handers and in their families New Research on Personality Disorders Ida V.
