Future Land Use:

Future Land Use Robert W. Burchell, David Listokin, 1976-12 Housing in the United States appears to be constantly in the throes of crises The public perception of American domestic crises including housing does not reflect changes in real conditions as much as it reflects a cycle of heightened public interest followed by boredom with the issue in question As one tries to envision the future of housing in the US one must not develop a trend based upon the temporary vagaries of the moment In this volume the editors discuss the long term elements that serve to define the matrix within which future housing markets must operate Future Land Use depicts the underlying stability and consistency of American life the long term socio demographic trends the alternative living arrangements that seem to be emerging the new attitudes toward urban growth and their legal manifestation the limitations imposed by the environmental movement the considerations imposed by a changing energy supply and the dilemmas arising from the intersection of these trends and forces Robert W Burchell and David Listokin conclude that despite changing conditions the long term dream of owning a single family house will still be a goal for most Americans In a society in which the drafting of a press release may be much more important than its content in which banners are used as surrogates for reality how do we all come to grips with weighing and evaluating the parameters that must be considered The immediate topic of the papers and discussion in Future Land Use raises a challenge for popular government and a clash between immediate comfort and longer range need

Residential Future Land Use Planning in South Florida Jay McLeod, 2011 ABSTRACT Future Land Use Maps FLUMs are a manifestation of a community's vision for the future development of an area and are mandated by Florida Statutes Chapter 163 3177 The FLUMs for over 85 cities and 15 counties from among the 154 local governments within the South Florida Water Management District SFWMD were initially assembled and compiled to understand cumulative regional vision and to allow the District to coordinate with local governments and enhance their ability to integrate land use and water resource planning Subsequently these aggregated FLUMs were used to study future land use planning specifically residential future land use planning in South Florida The FLUMs were standardized to the SFWMD Generalized Future Land Use Categories methodology which facilitates comparisons across political boundaries This information was used to identify large scale trends in future land use that span municipal boundaries These areas may benefit from future policy and planning assistance and can help focus the utilization of limited resources Nine counties in particular are used to illustrate a trend in FLUMs toward over allocation of residential future land use Six of the nine counties have enough data to be investigated further Using data from each local government FLUM within a county a population projection is extrapolated using a full buildout scenario of the current FLUM
