

While genre acts as a classificatory system, texts do not necessarily fit nicely into predefined “types” of genres. In fact, rhetoric as a dynamic and performative act necessarily creates hybrids out of previously defined genres. In “Rhetorical Hybrids: Fusions of Generic Elements,” Jamieson and Campbell analyze inaugural and papal speeches, noting that the rhetorical choices that speakers often make fused together preexisting genres in a process of constant borrowing and innovation. They warn against the tendency toward minimizing idiosyncrasies in order to magnify generic commonalities: “The notion of the hybrid enjoins the critic to focus both on the recurrent and the variable, the commonalities and the idiosyncrasies, and to understand the extent to which they are compatible or incompatible” (156). In many ways this is the same argument that Howell is making in Poetics, Rhetoric, and Logic: Howell argues that the trend to think of poetry as something outside of communication ignores the fact that “it does actually convey to readers a something that they did not have before” (217). Poetics merges with rhetoric and logic to become a hybridized rhetorical genre. In fact, maybe hybridized is the wrong word to use, as Howell argues that the three have always been together, and it is simply the history of genre that has arbitrarily separated poetics from rhetoric and logic. In the same way, novels have been relegated to a place outside of rhetorical consideration, which Zahava McKeon attempts to resolve in Novels and Arguments. McKeon’s argument is brilliant in its simplicity: The history of the novel is the history of social rhetoric. She critiques a history of belles lettres, arguing “[t]wentieth-century criticism has focused on the text as a unique object to be addressed in itself regardless of context, which includes author and audience” (230). Novels, like poetics, are legitimized as a different hybrid between what we have traditionally thought of as literature and what we have traditionally thought of as rhetoric.

Rhetorical Criticism Textbooks

I come at last to the textbooks themselves—the easily accessible gateway into rhetorical criticism. I have included only four undergraduate textbooks for review: The Practice of Rhetorical Criticism by James R. Andrews, Rhetorical Criticism: Explorations and Practice by Sonja K. Foss, The Art of Rhetorical Criticism, edited by Jim A. Kuypers, and Communication Criticism: Approaches and Genres by Karyn Charles Rybacki and Donald Jay Rybacki. This is not to say that rhetorical criticism textbooks are limited to these four books. Winifred Horner’s The Present State of Scholarship in Historical and Contemporary Rhetoric, Thomas W. Benson’s Landmark Essays on Rhetorical Criticism, and Carl R. Burgchardt’s Readings in Rhetorical Criticism are excellent collections of the
