ABSTRACT

Umbilical cord blood transplants are now used to treat numerous types of immune- and blood-related disorders and genetic diseases. Cord blood (CB) banks play an important role in these transplants by processing and storing CB units. In addition to their therapeutic potential, these banks raise ethical and regulatory questions, especially in emerging markets in the Arab world. In this article, the authors review CB banking in five countries in the region, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Qatar, and the United Arab Emirates, selected for their different CB banking policies and initiatives. In assessing these case studies, the authors present regional trends and issues, including religious perspectives, policies, and demographic risk factors. This research suggests strong incentives for increasing the number of CB units that are collected from and available to Arab populations. In addition, the deficit in knowledge concerning public opinion and awareness in the region should be addressed to ensure educated decision-making.

INTRODUCTION

In 1988, the first stem cell transplant using umbilical cord blood (CB) was performed to treat a pediatric patient suffering from Fanconi's anemia. Ten years later, the first CB transplant was carried out in the Arab world, and as the number of transplants continues to increase, the infrastructure for CB collection and storage has expanded [1]. The establishment of CB banks has expanded rapidly over the past decade, fueled largely by promising advances in CB transplantations.

The Arab world in particular is witnessing a proliferation in CB banks, often preceding regulatory policies and public discussions. Despite varying economic and political priorities in the region, several unique factors, including fertility rate and disease incidence, relate especially to CB banking (Table 1). Most controversial are the for-profit CB banks that have found an enthusiastic—but arguably under-informed—clientele in Arab countries. In addition, research on public opinion is needed to help create strong national and regional policy frameworks for CB banking programs.

BANKING MODELS: PUBLIC, PRIVATE, AND HYBRID

The discovery that CB contains hematopoietic stem cells (HSCs) turned the umbilical cord from disposable waste into a valuable resource. CB transplants have become standard therapies for numerous indications, and hundreds of clinical trials are being carried out internationally to investigate CB's therapeutic potential for a wider range of disorders, including autism, diabetes, and cerebral palsy. More than 3 million CB units are in storage around the world, with about 650,000 in public banks and 2.5 million in private facilities [2].

CB is collected after childbirth without adversely affecting the mother or infant. After collection, the bank tests the unit for diseases and viability for transplant and then freezes the eligible units until needed for transplant or, in some cases, research. CB is used for both allogeneic (related and unrelated) and autologous transplants. CB can be donated to a public bank where it can be accessed by any patient in need of a transplant. Conversely, parents can pay to store the CB unit in a private bank for family use. Hybrid banks have varying combinations of both public and private storage.

In the Arab world, only a few public CB banks exist (Table 2). Public banks collect and process donated CB
