An Exploratory Investigation of Group Supervision Jo Ann Hoese,1987

Clinical Group Supervision in Mental Health Counseling Training Maria Eugenia Araneda Bengoechea,2015

Clinical supervision that occurs in small groups involves interrelated dynamics that occur between group members and supervisors However literature exploring how clinical supervisors understand and approach group supervision process is limited Proposed from a conceptual framework grounded in groups systems and constructivist literature this study aimed to better understand a how supervisors who utilize group supervision understand promote and address group process within these groups b how supervisees experience group process and their supervisors handling of group process in their supervision groups and c what similarities and differences regarding group process emerge when comparing perspectives of supervisors and supervisees from the same group This investigation used a qualitative constructivist Grounded Theory design Charmaz 2011 to collect and analyze data Four counseling supervisors and their supervision groups were part of the study The data collection strategy involved two individual interviews with each supervisor group interviews with each of the supervisors groups and observations of group supervision sessions Findings show that supervisors had their own philosophy of group supervision but also that they shared numerous beliefs regarding this process and how to approach it many of which followed under a constructivist frame Participants considered supervisors genuineness as crucial in promoting a group supervision environment that allowed engaging in a horizontal and safe way They also underscored the benefit of discussing the supervisors approach to supervision and mutual expectations early in the supervision process While participants shared different perspectives regarding having an initial discussion of group norms in their supervision groups findings suggest that it is important to have certain norms established early on In addition supervisors conveyed that they used a specific group supervision structure in part to promote an appropriate group supervision environment Overall beginner trainees perceived the need for a group supervision structure that enabled them to receive more direct feedback and instruction than advanced students who acknowledged the benefit of having more time for self care built into their group supervision time Supervisors also identified challenges to creating an appropriate group supervision environment More specifically they identified challenges to supervisees active participation and peer feedback

Supervisors addressed these challenges using strategies that ranged from non direct questioning to teaching Supervisees however appeared to need a balance between non direct and direct strategies Lastly supervisors suggested addressing additional challenges to participation such as competitive behavior employing strategies that maintain the group s focus and safety These findings have important implications for clinical supervisors for supervision training as well as for future research Pages vii viii
