

Geochemistry - an Introduction

What is Geochemistry?

The urge to make geology more quantitative has led to the widespread inclusion of the so-called "basic" sciences such as physics and chemistry into the study of geology. The term "geochemistry" was first used by the Swiss chemist Schönbein in 1838. V.M. Goldschmidt, who is regarded as the founder of modern geochemistry, characterized geochemistry in 1933 with the following words:

"The major task of geochemistry is to investigate the composition of the Earth as a whole and of its various components and to uncover the laws that control the distribution of the various elements. To solve these problems, the geochemist needs a comprehensive collection of analytical data of terrestrial material, i.e. rocks, waters and atmosphere. Furthermore, he uses analyses of meteorites, astrophysical data about the composition of other cosmic bodies and geophysical data about the nature of the Earth's inside. Much useful information also came from the synthesis of minerals in the lab and from the observation of their mode of formation and stability conditions."
