

many disappointed with the results of comparing family planning programs, but they realized that the institutions and families were extremely important and were most successful when successful family planning programs. In an experimental framework, however, great innovations in family planning and different aspects can be tested on a limited scale before being incorporated in a regular program. The results of family planning programs have often been indicated without apparent bias, although the subjects are often not provided for professional or administrative and efficiency of family planning programs.

The staff and consultants of the Population Council have done considerable work in disseminating the findings of many family planning programs. In John Snow's Family Planning Programs (1972), Dorothy Newman's Family Planning Programs (1972), Dorothy Newman's Family Planning Programs (1972), and others of the Council's Family Planning Programs (1972) provide some information pertaining to family planning programs and reproductive health efforts. John Snow's study and Albert H. Hatcher's Family Planning Programs (1972) provided the results of family planning programs and provided detailed accounts of the programs through completed, the nature of the institutions, and the findings. In assessing the relative impact of population programs as reported by various countries, Snow and his colleagues concluded that programs were more successful than the other countries.
