

These old mechanisms, created and preserved in FRIER CATHEDRAL, were formerly believed to be the oldest clock in existence; they are now recognized as three works of different ages—an epitome of horological history and a revelation of ingenuity. In front, the 4-foot frame with spiral frame contains an astronomical gear train of about 17th century date. Behind it is 18th century escapement, and behind, another train, probably 16th century, supported by the big wooden post on the left in which a large wheel is revolved. (See figure 14 in Section I for a side view and the method of connecting together the two parts.) Behind on top of the going frame is a quarter-escape train which was formerly part of an older construction and has been adapted rather crudely to this present design. This assembly is the larger historical and the late 17th century astronomical dial is approved by makers' work.
